

ACT ONE

1 EXT. TRENCHES. SOMME. NORTHERN FRANCE. DAY.*

The air is full of flashes and the noise of guns. The Somme. November 1916. Men, covered from head to foot in mud, are pouring over the side of the trench and slipping and sliding into its murky, sodden safety. The last figure, as filthy as the rest, pulls himself back to his feet. It is Matthew Crawley.

MATTHEW: Is that you, Davis? How are we doing?

A slime-caked individual nods.

DAVIS: The stretcher bearers are with the boys now. Quite a few gone, I'm afraid, sir.

MATTHEW: Go back to the dug-out. I just want a moment with Sergeant Stephens.†

* We started in the Somme because it was a great bloodletting, and a massive, hideous event in which many, many men died. In other words, we chose to begin at the deep end as far as the war is concerned, but without yet committing Downton to its role in all this, because we wanted that decision to be reached on screen. I think it was fair enough; the enormity of the casualties coming back built and built and built, and by the end of 1915 people were aghast at the numbers of dead – figures that were reaching into all families up and down the land. High and low, nobody was spared, and it was a shared grief, which is something you don't see all that often, when a whole nation is bound by the same raw emotion. By 1916 I think that was true of the first war.

† I knew that eventually I wanted to use William (the footman from Downton) as Matthew's servant, but it seemed a bit neat to bring him in at the beginning, so we have a good performance from Stephen Ventura, who plays Matthew's initial servant, Davis. I'm always fascinated by how important it is to get good actors to play small parts. As most people making drama know, one line badly delivered in the middle of the scene can kill it dead. In this area, we have been lucky in our casting director, Jill Trevellick, who is meticulous when it comes to casting any part, but one of the bonuses of being a hit show is that people like to be in it. We have also been very fortunate in getting actors like Peter McNeil O'Connor, who played Sergeant Stephens, and other marvellous players in the supporting roles. They were all very talented.
