

15. Create an area chart of the range D5:D32,I5:I32 to show the cumulative profit of the quarry, showing the year in which the initial investment is paid back. Format the chart to make it easier to read, and then resize the chart to cover the range K5:P20.
16. In cell B13, calculate the total income from the quarry by adding all of the values in column E. In cell B14, calculate the total cost of the quarry by adding all of the values in columns F and G. Note that by the raw totals, the quarry appears to lose money over its history.
- ✚ Explore 17. Do the following to calculate the rate of return from the quarry:
 - a. In cell A17, enter 1.0% as your guess for the rate of return. In cell B17, calculate the internal rate of return using the profit values in column H and your guess in cell A17.
 - b. In cell A18, enter 10.0% as your guess for the rate of return. In cell B18, calculate the internal rate of return using the cash flow values in column H and your guess in cell A18.
- ✚ Explore 18. When a cash flow switches from positive to negative several times during its history, more than one internal rate of return is possible. To see how this is possible, you will do the following to calculate the net present value for different possible discount rates:
 - a. In the range A21:A39, enter the discount rates from 1% to 10% in steps of 0.5%.
 - b. In the range B21:B39, add the value of cell H6 to the present value of the cash flows in the H7:H32 range using the NPV function with the corresponding discount rate in column A.
19. Create a line chart of the values in the range A20:B39, using the percentages in the range A21:A39 as category levels. Format the chart to make it easier to read.
20. Resize the chart to cover the range K22:P39. The net present value crosses the x-axis twice, resulting in two possible internal rates of return depending on the initial guess of the rate of return.
21. Save the workbook, and then close it.
