15-minute time period. Data must be taken at regular intervals and should be recorded to permit an evaluation of the turbine performance and maintenance requirements as a function of operating time. This operating inspection data, summarized in Figure 33, includes: load versus exhaust temperature, vibration level, fuel flow and pressure, bearing metal temperature, lube oil pressure, exhaust gas temperatures, exhaust temperature spread variation, startup time, and coast-down time. This list is only a minimum and other parameters should be used as necessary. A graph of these parameters will help provide a basis for judging the conditions of the system. Deviations from the norm help pinpoint impending issues, changes in calibration, or damaged components.

A sudden abnormal change in running conditions or a severe trip event could indicate damage to internal components. Conditions that may indicate turbine damage include high vibration, high exhaust temperature spreads, compressor surge, abnormal changes in health monitoring systems, and abnormal changes in other monitoring systems. It is recommended to conduct a borescope inspection after such events whenever component damage is suspected.
