Lalwani,2018-03-12 Doctoral Thesis Dissertation from the year 2016 in the subject Engineering Mechanical Engineering grade Distinction Sardar Vallabhbhai National Institute of Technology language English abstract A 2 5D pocket milling is extensively used in aerospace shipyard automobile dies and molds industries In machining of 2 5D pockets directional parallel tool path and contour parallel tool path are widely used However these tool paths significantly limit the machining efficiency In the present work an attempt has been made to generate a spiral tool path for machining of 2 5D star shaped pocket for improving machining efficiency The spiral tool path is developed using second order elliptic partial differential equation PDE and it is free from sharp corners inside the pocket region Further the implementation of proposed method is presented on complex non star shaped polygon pocket bounded by free form curve and pocket with island The shape of pocket geometry tool path strategy and various machining parameters speed feed rate and depth of cut affect machining performance However the effect of the shape of a pocket geometry and tool path strategy on the performance of pocket machining is scarcely reported Hence an attempt has been made to investigate the effect of aspect ratio feed rate and tool path strategies zig zag spiral and contour parallel on tool path length cutting time percentage utilization of a tool and average surface roughness in machining of AISI 304 stainless steel using design of experiments DOE From the findings of above experimental investigation it was anticipated that there is a need to develop a method or technique for comparing different pocket geometry quantitatively and predict the effect of pocket geometry on pocket machining A novel approach is reported for quantitative comparison of different pocket geometries using a dimensionless number Divyang Number DN The concept and formula of DN are developed and DN is calculated for various pocket geometries The guidelines for comparing pocket geometries based on DN and PUT percentage utilization of tool are reported The results show that DN can be used to predict the quality of tool path prior to tool path generation Further an algorithm to decompose pocket geometry parent geometry into sub geometries is developed that improves the efficiency of spiral tool path for bottle neck pockets using HARI Number The results indicate that decomposing pocket geometry with the new algorithm improves HARIN and removes the effect of bottle necks Furthermore the algorithm for decomposition is extended for pockets that are bounded by free form curves
