Generalized Depression

A depressive disorder is a condition that involves the body, mood, and thoughts. It decreases motivation and interferes with normal functioning of daily life. It typically causes pain both to the person experiencing the mood disturbance and those who care about them. Major depressive disorder, or major depression, is manifested in a persistently sad mood accompanied by a number of other symptoms that interfere with the ability to work, study, sleep, eat, and enjoy once pleasurable activities. The causes of depression disorders range from a combination of biological, psychological, and social sources of distress.

Some research into the causes of generalized depression disorder comes from an experiment conducted by Alloy in 1999. The aim of the experiment was to investigate whether cognitive thinking style can predict the onset of depression in young Americans. American college freshmen were given a Cognitive Style Questionnaire that split them into two groups: positive cognitive group and negative cognitive group. Follow-up assessments conducted on a regular basis for 5.5 years. The results showed that there may be a link between cognitive style and development of depression; after 6 years, only 1% developed Major Depressive Disorder in the positive group while 17% in the negative group developed depression in the first 2.5 years of follow-up assessments. Joiner conducted an experiment in 1996 to study generalized depressive disorder. The aim of the experiment was to investigate whether cognitive patterns before an exam affects their tendency to develop depressive symptoms after the results of the exam. The researchers gave a questionnaire to university students before mid-term exams. Those who had negative thoughts before the exam and who ended up doing poorly showed an increase in depressive symptoms. However, those that did well, did not. This shows that
