Overselective Stimulus Control

Written instructions that guide learner responses.

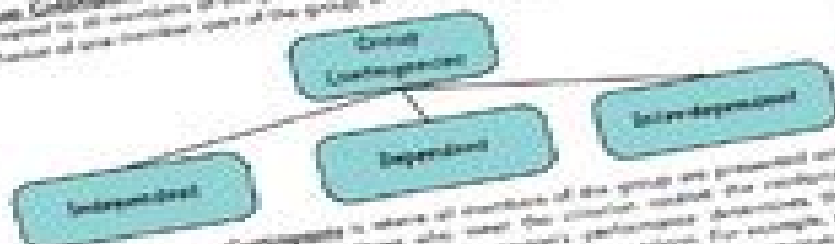

Demonstrating the target behavior for the learner to imitate.

Factors Influencing The Success of Prompts

Design and evaluate group contingencies.

Group contingencies are interventions where consequences typically reinforcement are delivered to all members of the group, contingent on pre-determined criteria for the target behavior of one member, part of the group, or the entire group.

Independent Group Contingency is where all members of the group are presented with the same consequence, but only those who meet the criterion control the consequence. Reinforcement is individualized, meaning each person's performance determines their access to the reinforcer, regardless of how others in the group perform. For example, in a classroom, every student who completed homework that was assigned the previous day earns an extra 10 minutes of recess.

A limitation of this method is that if the reinforcer is not motivating to the individual, there may be little to no change in the target behavior.

Dependent is where the group's reinforcer depends on the performance of all members of the group. If the target individual does not meet the criterion, the group receives the reinforcer. If not, no one receives the reinforcer. Thus, every student completed the homework that was assigned the previous day earns an extra 10 minutes of recess.

This method may lead to looking and other negative behaviors.
