Chapter 3 - Rescue Incident

Management Questions and Answers

100% Verified

Which of those listed below are often used in multijurisdictional or multiagency incident management? It allows agencies with different legal, geographic, and functional responsibilities to coordinate, plan, and interact effectively. It allows multiple agency representatives to make command decisions, instead of a single incident commander making all decisions on scene. - answer Unified Command

Which is established to divide the incident into functional areas of operation? - answer Groups

A(n) _____ area is an area that surrounds the incident site and whose size is proportional to the hazards that exist. - answer Rescue

The safety officer must immediately report to the IC any action taken that may affect a strategic goal or tactical objective unless: - answer None of the above (They must ALWAYS notify the IC).

In most situations, one person can effectively supervise only three to seven people (with five being the optimal number). In the ICS setting, the incident commander (IC) communicates with and receives information from a maximum of five people, rather than assuming responsibility for the assignment of all personnel at the scene. Individual managers of personnel and resources within ICS also work within this same system. The actual span of control will depend on the complexity of the incident and the nature of the work being performed. This is known as: - answer Span of control

To all organizations and ICs, the _____ of their personnel are of the highest importance. Members who are injured not only reduce the available personnel by their loss, but can also divert other personnel and resources when they must come to the injured individual's aid. - answer Health and safety

Although determination of the jurisdiction in charge is rarely a problem for a structure fire, larger-scale incidents may cross geographic or statutory boundaries. Which of those listed below clearly defines which agency will be in charge of each incident? - answer An effective Incident Command System (ICS)
