The Historical Progression of Psychology

There are many theoretical approaches in psychology designed to explain certain behaviors. Some of the earliest approaches to explaining behavior in psychology include structuralism and functionalism.

Structuralism

Wilhelm Wundt combined physiology and philosophy to create psychology and established the first psychology lab in Germany (1879). He believed in introspection and structuralism.

Structuralism says that structure is more important than function. Structuralists believed that the mind must be broken into elements to understand the brain and its functions. With the use of introspection 🧐 (looking inward), people try to understand the thoughts or emotions they are experiencing at the time.

For structuralism to work, the subject would have to be very intelligent and verbal in order to describe their sensations, images, and feelings in certain moments. Also, introspection proved unreliable since the results varied from person to person. As a result, the impact of introspection waned, as did structuralism.

Functionalism

Functionalism came after structuralism and was created to understand how the conscious mind is related to behavior. Functionalists, such as William James, wanted to know how the mind affected what people did.

Early Behaviorism

Early Behaviorism was the study of observable events. This theory shifted psychology from a study of the unconscious and conscious mind to a more science-based study based on observable events.

John Watson was a behavioral psychologist who studied observable behaviors and led the Little Albert experiment, where he trained an 11-month-old boy to fear a white rat. 🐭 The boy was not initially afraid of the rat, but when the white rat was paired with a loud sound, the boy would show signs of distress. Eventually, the boy began to cry when just seeing the white rat without the sound. Watson believed that observable events are the only events that can be proven true, unlike studying the conscious, where results are not verifiable.

Gestalt Psychology

Gestalt psychology says that the whole is different than the sum of its parts. Gestalt psychology looks at the mind and behavior as a whole. It suggests that human minds do not focus on small components. Instead, humans see the greater whole. Examples of Gestalt principles are below and discussed in further detail in Unit 3.
