Changes in scientific work are driven by the shift to grid-based worlds, the use of information and communication systems, and the existential infrastructure which includes global collaboration. In this context, the book addresses emerging issues such as open access collaboration and virtual communities and highlights the diverse range of developments associated with e-Science. As such, it will be of interest to researchers and scholars in the fields of information technology and knowledge management. E-Research Collaboration of International Scope in Social and Political Sciences Mayo Fuster Morell, 2016 This chapter presents a comparative analysis of three case studies all from the field of social and political science on global e-research collaboration, describing how Information and Communication Technologies (ICTs) are facilitating the overcoming of geographical barriers. Previous research points out that physical e-research collaboration meetings play a relevant role. This chapter explores whether this requirement of physical meetings in e-research collaboration is independent of the scale and complexity of the collaboration established. The findings suggest that high complexity can be achieved using communication tools if the scale of the group is small, while very large groups can collaborate using communication tools if their target is a loose collaboration. However, if the collaboration involves both a large group and a considered complexity of collaboration, establishing a balance between communication tools with the requirement of physical meetings becomes a relevant issue.
